Experiment with ancestry.com and 23andMe.com reveal interesting results

By Vera Hogan

The Tri-County Times management decided to conduct a little experiment this year and I was chosen to serve as the guinea pig if you will. The company paid for two DNA kits—one through ancestry.com and the other, 23andMe.com—to see if the results were the same or vastly different. But let me back up. The first plan was to go through ancestry.com to see if what came back was accurate as far as my personal ancestry. I received the kit, which involved dropping saliva into a little vial, mixing the little solution and shipping it off. I did this at my desk at the office. First, however, I needed something to wet my whistle. Instead of getting some water, I opened my desk drawer and found a blue Dum Dum sucker (aptly named considering) that had been in there for about a year and popped it in my mouth. Perfect, I can do this spit thing now.

As I dropped saliva into the little vial, I immediately realized my mistake. It was blue. Oh well, there’s no turning back now so I completed the task and mailed it in, keeping my fingers crossed for accurate results.

About six weeks later, I got an email from ancestry.com that said they could not complete my DNA test with the sample (saliva) that I provided. I was relieved to learn that they were sending me a new test kit, free of charge.

Any way, since I had to do it all again, we decided to purchase the 23andMe.com kit, too. When they arrived, I would do the saliva thing for both at the very same time. That occurred on a Sunday, after only having water in my mouth.

THE RESULTS

Ancestry.com

According to ancestry.com, my ancestry is 69 percent German, 21 percent Eastern Europe and Russia, and 10 percent Baltic States. That’s very accurate since my father is 100 percent German and my mother was born in a country that no longer exists as it was — East Prussia (Poland/Russia).

My DNA story started in the year 1700 and goes all the way to 1925. Throughout that entire time, my results show that my United States connection is through Pennsylvania settlers. Since I’ve only been to Pennsylvania one time I find this interesting and will do more research at a later time. I wonder if my ancestors wore black dresses, little white bonnets and rode in buggies. I would love to know that.

Then I looked up my DNA matches and the first name that popped up is my youngest son, William. Under his name are some Hansons and McGraths — I don’t know anyone by those last names but it does give me more to look into.

I tried to create a family tree on ancestry.com but didn’t get very far because I lack some important information, like maiden names for anyone older than my own mother, some birth dates, etc. I can get that information, I just don’t have it now.

What did startle me, however, was when I plugged in my dad’s name, my paternal grandfather’s name and date of birth popped up automatically and it was accurate. How did...
Money laundering — it’s not a bad thing

My coworker, Hannah Ball, wrote an article about more businesses passing credit card fees onto their customers. It was published in the Wednesday, Nov. 28 edition (If you don’t get Midweek edition you should, good stuff in there). It says businesses are paying up to 4 percent per credit and debit card transaction every time a customer uses a card. These fees will likely get passed on to consumers.

I don’t care. I will pay the fees anytime, anywhere. I am not a germophobe by any means. They say germs can make you sick. I probably have some drug that will likely get passed on to consumers.

If you have some cash in your purse or pocket, you probably have some drug money. Scientists have found that traces of cocaine can be found on 90 percent of dollar bills. Cocaine users roll these dollar bills into a straw-like tube from which they snort the cocaine. So not only is it located in a nice, warm dark place where bacteria likes to grow, if you have some cash in your purse or pocket, you probably have some drug money. Scientists have found that traces of cocaine can be found on 90 percent of dollar bills. Cocaine users roll these dollar bills into a straw-like tube from which they snort the cocaine. So not only is that bill laced with cocaine, think about that drug user sticking the end of that rolled up bill into his or her nose.

Then, when the party is over a few days later, the cocaine user unrolls that money before heading to the nearest fast food place. He hands it over to the cashier and within the next few transactions, that money can be in the hands of a mom with small children and so on.

Speaking of small children, specifically babies, do you think everyone washes their hands after changing a poopy diaper? I think not. They even have changing tables in the bathroom of many restaurants. Right across from the sinks. Hint, hint.

Paper money can carry more germs that a household toilet. A significant 94 percent of dollar bills tested, according to marketwatch.com, contained harmful pathogens like staphylococcus, the bacteria that causes staph infections, which is passed by not washing hands after using the restroom.

Then there’s dog spit! A study by the NYU School of Medicine found that more than 100 different strains of bacteria on dollar bills also found traces of DNA from unspecified domestic animals. I love my dog, too, but like most dogs, he not only gives big wet kisses on our faces with his tongue, he licks his butt, too.

Like I said, I would rather pay the 4 percent, or whatever it is fee than deal with cash on a regular basis. I can gently wipe my plastic debit card clean. People who disagree should remember to wash their hands with soap and water after handling paper money — and before they touch their face, mouth, eyes, nose or any skin abrasions, or before eating and drinking.

If you’ve ever forgotten the bills in your jeans pocket and put them through the washing machine — that’s probably a good thing. Just sayin’!

ANCESTRY

they know? I know, someone else on ancestry.com is related to me through my grandfather. Anyway, I look forward to finishing that tree.

To make a long story short, ancestry.com provided me with accurate, and interesting results. I need to keep in mind that only those who paid to get their DNA results will show up in my results, if we’re somehow related that is.

THE RESULTS
23andMe.com

This report shows that 171 populations were tested and it turned out that I am 99.8 percent of European descent, with Germany being the highest likely match at 28.4 percent for Eastern European. It does, however, say, “Although we’ve detected Eastern European DNA in your ancestral breakdown, we have not identified more specific locations for that recent ancestors may have called home.”

This company tells me I have 978 DNA relatives in my DNA family. One is a close family member, 433 are third to fourth cousins and 545 are fifth to distant cousins. They live in 31 states and two countries. The top states are California with 90 DNA relatives and Pennsylvania with 55.

They also provide some strange data comparing the average 23andMe customer and me, such as my DNA relatives are 56 more likely to have red body or facial hair and 48 percent less likely to be a vegetarian, things like that.

With both this site and ancestry.com, more money is required to go further and receive more information. The 23andMe.com organization offers a health summary option for another $125 (so much spit needed?) I could find out what my chances are of getting a variety of diseases, but I choose not to.

HAPLOGROUPS
A haplogroup is a genetic population group of people who share a common ancestor on the paternal or the maternal line.

According to my 23andMe results, the most famous person in my maternal haplogroup is Marie Antoinette (1755-1793). There doesn’t appear to be anyone famous in my paternal haplogroup.

NEANDERTHAL ANCESTRY
According to 23andMe.com, I have 261 Neanderthal variants. They say this is fewer than 70 percent of their customers, but it is still weird. Neanderthals were ancient humans who interbred with modern humans before becoming extinct 40,000 years ago. This report tells me how much of my ancestry can be traced back to Neanderthals.

And they got all of that from a little spit!
